CINEMABITES: Nothing Fancy

82 mins | Rated G | Biography

Master chef, teacher and environmental activist Diana Kennedy is living proof that size has nothing to do with strength. Now in her 90s and barely five feet tall, she's a fierce jolt of energy that has become one of the most celebrated culinary legends of Mexican cuisine. Aware of her own mortality, she works tirelessly to solidify her legacy with the hope of turning her home into a foundation for culinary education in Mexico. Blending incredible archival footage from her many television appearances and unprecedented access to the ecologically sustainable home where she cooks, recycles rainwater, uses solar power and grows her own crops, Nothing Fancy is a charming homage to a culinary trailblazer and a true inspiration. But whatever you do, don't blend your avocado!

The Bit Player

92 mins | Rated PG-13 | Documentary

In a blockbuster paper in 1948, Claude Shannon introduced the notion of a "bit" and laid the foundation for the information age. His ideas ripple through nearly every aspect of modern life, influencing such diverse fields as communication, computing, cryptography, neuroscience, artificial intelligence, cosmology, linguistics, and genetics. But when interviewed in the 1980s, Shannon was more interested in showing off the gadgets he'd constructed — juggling robots, a Rubik's Cube solving machine, a wearable computer to win at roulette, a unicycle without pedals, a flame-throwing trumpet — than rehashing the past. Mixing contemporary interviews, archival film, animation and dialogue drawn from interviews conducted with Shannon himself, The Bit Player tells the story of an overlooked genius who revolutionized the world, but never lost his childlike curiosity.

Q&A following the film with the Director, Mark Levinson, who also was responsible for the award-winning PARTICLE FEVER.
